LE STORIE di Emma

Emma the superhero

Once upon a time there was a very brave little girl called Emma.

She was a strong and courageous child. In fact, she was only 11 months old when she let go of her mum's hands to start walking unaided.

She no longer felt the need for help and she couldn't bear being followed or held by the hand: she absolutely had to walk by herself and if someone tried to get close to her, Emma would get so angry that she would become red in the face.

Even when she was eating, if mum or dad tried to hold her fork or spoon to help her, she clenched her fists so hard as if she wanted to scream to the whole world "I have to do it by myself!" Emma was already free and independent as a child; she was not afraid of anything, such as standing up on a glass cabinet or bravely stroking all the stray animals she found around the town. Her parents had already realised that this little girl would drive them crazy once she grew up: Emma didn't want a hand, she didn't want an arm, she didn't want help and she absolutely didn't want to take "no" for an answer.

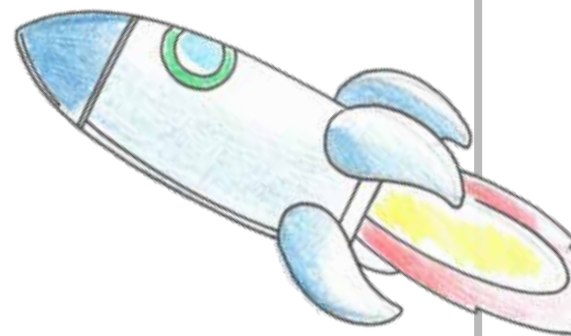

It was Emma who wanted to help others and it was the others who needed her. One day, her mum asked her: "Emma, what do you want to be when you grow up?" and that little blonde girl raised her chin proudly and answered: "I want to be a strong girl", a Baby Woman with a blue, red and gold glitter costume and fire-wing boots so that I get everywhere around the world more quickly. So much so that she became a superhero even during her younger years, exactly like Wonder Woman, to rescue children who were in difficulty or danger.

You know those people with super powers who you see on television, in cartoons and in comics? Just like them. She even had a Baby Woman-Signal, a light projector in the shape of little Emma that was launched into the sky to warn the bad guys that the legendary Superhero Baby Woman was on her way.
